At the end of life, a person is often living, and dying, with one or more chronic illnesses and needs care for days, weeks, or even months.

One of the most difficult issues to emerge during the national debate on health reform is how to best care for people in the final stages of life. What kind of treatment should a dying person receive? Who ought to pay for this care? And how are these difficult decisions made?

Join us for a thought-provoking evening on the ethical and financial issues that are important in the care of people near the end of life.
